

Putting people first

The key to improving
public services

Two-week study programme in the UK for senior managers responsible for delivering public services
7 to 18 June 2010

About the programme

Governments must change as the world around them changes. New priorities, advances in information technology, the media and electronic communications, the impact of globalisation and public pressure for higher quality services all demand that governments constantly improve their services and review their processes.

In particular, citizens increasingly expect public services to be more transparent, accessible and accountable, and more responsive to their needs. In the UK there have been major changes in the way public services operate. Initiatives such as the Executive Agencies programme in the 1980s and 1990s, Citizen's Charters and Chartermarks (recently replaced by Customer Service Excellence) in the 1990s and benchmarking techniques have all been aimed at improving the quality of service delivery to the public. As in many countries, health services, local government, education and the administration of the courts have all undergone major reform with an emphasis on treating citizens as customers. A key feature of these reforms has been the development of effective complaint-handling procedures and systems for redress of grievances.

Since 1998, the UK government has embarked upon a comprehensive programme of public service modernisation, including a drive towards "joined-up" government. This has involved closer collaboration and co-ordination between different providers of public services, including the private sector, and better-integrated, more accessible services for citizens, making greater use of information and communication technology and "one-stop shops".

This study programme explores the key elements needed to develop a culture of customer focus in the context of provision of public services. By drawing on UK and international experience and introducing some of the techniques available, participants will increase their knowledge and understanding of how their own organisation can achieve sustainable institutional and cultural change to the benefit of their citizens, along with a more cost-effective use of resources.

Who is it for?

The programme is designed for senior managers responsible for delivering public services, in particular those with direct interface with the public. It will be of interest to participants who work in central and local government, health and welfare services, education, the administration of justice and complaints adjudication. All participants will have a special interest in improving organisational performance and service delivery.

How participants will benefit

The study programme will:

- Examine citizens' rights to good public services
- Increase understanding of the process of culture change required to see citizens as customers
- Look at initiatives developed by central and local government to improve public services
- Consider lessons learned by the public sector from the private/non-government sectors and vice versa
- Explore the ways in which a focus on the citizen as customer, including consultation procedures, can improve public services
- Compare techniques for organisational assessment and review (the use of customer surveys and feedback, benchmarking, continuous improvement programmes)
- Explore the advantages and disadvantages of using information technology in managing service delivery
- Give participants the opportunity to exchange experiences and make international comparisons, identifying areas for development and improvement in their own organisations.

What the programme will cover

The programme will include briefings, discussion sessions, case studies, practical exercises and appropriate visits to key practitioners. A key element for sharing knowledge and best practice will be sessions where individual participants will be invited to give informal presentations from their own experience of managing public service delivery. Participants will also be invited to develop action plans relevant to their own work experience.
